North Korea Says Underwater-Launched Missile Test Succeeded

- ▶ South Korea's military says it is "highly likely" that North Korea has tested a missile designed for launch from a submarine. It said the launch appeared to have taken place early Wednesday near the city of Wonsan on the country's eastern coast.
- ▶ South Korea says the missile traveled about 450 kilometers and reached a height of about 910 kilometers. David Wright of the Union of Concerned Scientists said that although the missile did not travel far, it was able to do so.

Citizens and Scientists for Environmental Solutions

The Union of Concerned Scientists is a national nonprofit organization founded 50 years ago by scientists and students at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Our mission: to use rigorous, independent science to solve our planet's most pressing/critical problems. Joining with people across the country, we combine technical analysis and effective advocacy to create innovative, practical solutions for a healthy, safe, and sustainable future. Today, we are a group of nearly 250 scientists, analysts, policy and communication experts dedicated to that purpose.

- ▶ “This would classify the missile as a medium range (missile),” he said.
- ▶ It is not clear if North Korea launched the missile from a submarine or an underwater structure.
- ▶ If confirmed, it could be the first time since 2017 that the North has tested a missile that is able to travel more than a “short” distance.
- ▶ Japanese officials said Wednesday that the missile landed in the country’s exclusive economic zone. That is the area countries claim that extends about 370 kilometers from their coast.

- ▶ Kim Dong-yub is a North Korea expert at Kyungnam University's Institute for Far Eastern Studies in Seoul. He said the most recent launch most likely carried a double message. Kim said it may have been meant to improve the North's negotiating position and also to answer South Korea's announcement of new weapons, including the F-35 stealth fighter from the U.S.

- ▶ North Korean and American negotiators are to meet for talks Saturday. They would be the first talks between the countries since their leaders met at the demilitarized zone separating the two Koreas. At that time, President Donald Trump became the first U.S. president to enter North Korea while in office. There, he and North Korean leader Kim Jong Un agreed to restart working-level talks between their nations.
- ▶ Last month, Trump said a “new method” to the nuclear talks would be, in his words, “very good.” North Korean officials have called for a “new way of calculation” as the only way forward (towards a good result).

- ▶ Last month, Trump dismissed National Security Advisor John Bolton who disagreed with parts of the president's North Korea diplomacy.
- ▶ North Korea has repeatedly said it will not give up its nuclear weapons without anything in return. The country wants to take steps after which the U.S. eases some sanctions and provides security guarantees.
- ▶ Trump and Kim have met three times since June 2018. During their first meeting, the two agreed to work towards the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. However, negotiators have not yet agreed on what that means.

- ▶ Melissa Hanham is an expert with the Open Nuclear Network, a research group based in Colorado. She said that she hoped the talks would permit the negotiators to build ties and “perhaps lead to some actionable leads/advantages.” About the negotiations, she added, “Any substantive/meaningful/useful working-level talks are good. Diplomacy is like a muscle and it needs exercise.”

North Korea has confirmed it successfully launched a new ballistic missile from a submarine, in a move intended to raise pressure on the US as the two countries prepare to resume nuclear talks at the weekend. Wednesday's launch was Pyongyang's most provocative weapons test since it began denuclearization talks with Washington early last year. Perfecting SLBM technology would significantly expand North Korea's military options, enabling it to deploy missiles far beyond the Korean peninsula and giving it a "second-strike" capability in the event of an attack on its military bases. Missiles fired from underwater are also harder to detect before liftoff than ground-based missiles.
